Myers-Briggs Personality Test Result: an analysis and realization

My personality type, the 'Defender' (ISFJ-A), reveals that I am somewhat introverted(58%), more of a 'feeling' nature (63%), balanced between assertive and turbulent(53% assertive), observing (59%) on surroundings and 58% 'judging.'

So, what does it say about my persona?

My 'Feeling' trait dominates decision-making, reflecting a 63% inclination towards compassion and harmony. This is not a true reflection of my calm 'feeling' nature. I focus more on people's underlying emotions rather than their outward behaviors. The way individuals behave in public is of minimal concern to me, as our true nature is most authentically expressed in private settings like home or work. In my personal experience, some people's social media presence is reminiscent of the pre-war era, glamorous and striking. At the same time, their family lives are more akin to the post-war reality, irreparably damaged.

My 'Judging' preference is evident in my love for order and structure, guiding me towards well-planned, organized paths (only when I feel doing so, honestly).

My assertiveness is moderate, and yes, it's one of my weaknesses.

At 58% introverted, this percentage seems fitting for me. Although I enjoy social events, I barely try to catch everyone's attention and prefer to keep myself to myself amongst a crowd of less-known people. I adore intimate gatherings where we all know each other.

The test reveals that in my role as a Sentinel, I exhibit a strong sense of duty, compassion, and emotional security to my immediate circle. The nature of 'Confident Individualism', discovered by this test, does not necessarily define me since, in a group atmosphere, I'm the most generous to others' opinions and less reliant on my own capabilities. Groupwork is my valuable quality. I am trying to understand why I seem individualistic.

This awareness as an ISFJ-A is enlightening, helping me harness supportive roles, which is where my strengths shine, particularly in fields that demand nurturing, such as healthcare or education. It also makes me mindful of potential pitfalls, such as my sensitivity to critique or hesitation toward change, which I consciously work to mitigate.

In essence, I thrive in environments where my protective instincts and organizational skills can be used to safeguard and guide others, suggested correctly by this test.
